A node, in the world of digital currency, is a computer that connects to a cryptocurrency network. The node or computer supports the network. It supports it through validation and relaying transactions. At the same time, it also gets a copy of the full blockchain. Any computer that connects to the Bitcoin network, for example, is a node.

What began as NOIA, an ambitious effort from a small group of eager individuals, eventually evolved into something much larger: Syntropy. Our efforts no longer represent a single project or application. This is a global movement to change the internet for the better. The Syntropy ecosystem is developed and managed by open-source developers from .
